

In villages, town and cities throughout the world, a place of reverence exists. It is a place where generations have been laid to rest. It is a place where one can reflect on the past and prepare for the future.

Earl Killmer had a keen sense of responsibility as he cared for this place named Rosehill Memorial Park in Minot, ND. He had a feel for what this hallowed place meant. He realized that this place was to be cared for with respect for those in the past and for those present and in the future.

It was not only a responsibility for mere grass, trees or shrubbery. Earl also held himself responsible for the individuals that assisted him in the care for this place. He was kind, resourceful and understanding. He remained a source of reference for those that followed him. There are some, including this writer, whose careers sprang from the influence of Earl Killmer and the place named Rosehill Memorial Park.

We will always have fond memories of Earl, especially with his attachment to Rosehill Memorial Park. His influence there will be an everlasting memorial to this fine man and his works here on earth. It is our hope that he will be rewarded with a special place in Heaven.
